"Books you may hold readily in your hand are the most useful, after all."

DR. JOHNSON.

HARPER'S HANDY SERIES.

NOTICE.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS beg leave to announce that with the story entitled "That Terrible Man," by Mr. W. E. NORRIS, author of "Matrimony," "Heaps of Money," and other favorite novels, they have begun the issue of a new series of publications, to be called HARPER'S HANDY SERIES, which is intended to supply the best current literature in a form that shall combine the cheapness of the popular library with neatness and portability.

The Series will be issued weekly, and will include instructive and entertaining books in biography, history, travel, fiction, and general literature.

The selection of volumes for HARPER'S HANDY SERIES will be made with great care, and with scrupulous regard not only to literary excellence but also to purity of moral tone. The publishers will studiously endeavor to exclude from it all works unsuitable for family reading.

The volumes in HARPER'S HANDY SERIES will be compact in form and attractive in appearance. They will be of duodecimo shape, adapted to the satchel or pocket, bound in tasteful paper covers, and sold at about twenty-five cents each.

Lists of HARPER'S HANDY SERIES and HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, each series published weekly, will be furnished on application to the publishers.

MIGNON.

Chapter I.

It was considerably after midnight when one of three officers seated at a whist-table in the mess-room of the Cavalry Barracks at Idleminster, where the Scarlet Lancers were quartered, called out, "Bootles, come and take a hand—there's a good chap."

Captain Algernon Ferrers, more commonly known as "Bootles," looked up.

"I don't mind if I do," he said, rising and moving towards them. "What do you want me to do? Who's my partner?"

The three other men stared at one another in surprise, for Bootles was one of the best whist-players in the regiment, and in an ordinary way would as soon have thought of counting honors as of settling the questions of partners other than by cutting, except in the case of a revenge.

"Why, take a card, of course, my friend," laughed Lacy, in a ridiculously soft voice. Lacy was a recent importation from the White Dragoons, and had taken possession of the place left vacant in Bootles's every-day life by Scott Laurie's marriage.

"Ah, yes; to be sure—cut, of course. I believe," said Bootles, looking at the three faces before him in an uncertain way—"I believe I've got a headache."

"Oh, nothing like whist for a headache," answered Hartog, turning up the last card. "Ace of diamonds." However, after stumbling through one game—after twice trumping his partner's trick, a revoke, and several such like blunders—he rose to his feet.

"It's no use, you fellows; I'm no good to-night—I can't even see the cards. Get some one to take my place and make a fresh start."

"Why, you're ill, Bootles," cried Preston. "What is it?"

"It's a devil of a headache," answered Bootles, promptly. "Here's Miles—the very man. Good-night."

"Good-night," called the fellows after him. Then they settled down to their game, and Preston dealt.

"Never saw Bootles seedy before," said Lacy.

"Oh yes; he gets these headaches sometimes," answered Hartog. "Not often, though. Miles, your lead."

Meantime Bootles went wearily away, almost feeling his road under the veranda of the mess-rooms, along the broad pavé in front of the officers' quarters, and up the wide flight of stone steps to his rooms facing the green of the barrack square. Being the senior captain, with only one bachelor field-officer in the regiment, he had two large and pleasant rooms, not very grandly furnished, for, though a rich man, he was not an extravagant one, and saw no fun in having costly goods and chattels to be at the tender mercies of soldier servants; but they were neat, clean, and comfortable, with a sufficiency of great easy travelling-chairs, plenty of fur rugs, and lots of pretty little pictures and knickknacks.

The fire in his sitting-room was fast dying out, but a bright and cheerful blaze illumined his sleeping-room, shining on the brass knobs of his cot, on the silver ornamentations at the corners of his dressing-case, on three or four scent bottles on the tall cretonne-petticoated toilette table, and on the tired but resplendent figure of Bootles himself.

He dragged the big chair pretty near to the fire, and dropped into it with a sigh of relief, absolutely too sick and weary to think about getting into bed just then. As Hartog had said, sometimes these headaches seized him, but it did not happen often; in fact, he had not had one for more than a year—quite often enough, he said.

Well, he had been lying in the big and easy chair, his eyes shut and his hands hanging idly over the broad straps which served for arms, for perhaps half an hour, when to his surprise he heard a soft rustling movement behind him. His first and not unnatural thought was that the fellows had come to draw him, so, without moving, he called out, "Oh! confound it all, don't come boring a poor devil with a headache. By Jove, it's cruelty to animals, neither more nor less."

The soft rustling ceased, and Bootles closed his eyes again, with a devout prayer that they would, in response to this appeal, take themselves off. But presently it began again, accompanied by a sound which made his heart jump almost into his mouth, and beat so furiously as to be simply suffocating. It stopped—was repeated—"The—DEVIL," muttered Bootles.

But it was not the devil at all—more like a little angel, in truth; for after a moment's irresolution he sprang from his chair and faced the horror behind him. It really was a horror to him, for there, sitting up among the pillows of the cot, with the clothes pushed back, was a baby, a baby whose short golden curls shone in the fire-light—a little child dressed in white, with a pair of wide-open, wondering eyes, as bright as stars and as blue as sapphires.

Bootles stood in dismay staring at it.

"Where, in the name of all that's wonderful, did you come from?" he asked aloud, keeping at a safe distance lest it should suddenly start howling.

But the little stranger did not howl; on the contrary, as its bewildered eyes fell upon Bootles's resplendent figure, his gold-laced scarlet jacket and gold-embroidered waistcoat of white velvet, his gold-laced overalls and jingling spurs, it stretched out its little arms and cried, "Boo, boo, boo—!"

Bootles took a step back in his surprise, and his headache vanished as if by magic.

"By—Jove!" he exclaimed.

"Boo—boo—boo!" crowed the usurper of the cot, cheerily.

Bootles went a step nearer. "Why, you're a queer little beggar," he remarked. "Where did you come from, eh?"

The "queer little beggar" suddenly changed its tone, and started another system of crowing more triumphant and cheery than the first.

"Chucka—chucka—chucka—chuck!" it went.

Bootles began to laugh. "Can't talk, hey? Well, what do you want?" as it struggled fiercely to rise, and stretched out its small arms more impatiently than before. "Want to be lifted up, hey? Oh, but dash it," scratching his head perplexedly, "I can't lift you up, you know; it's out of the question—impossible. By Jove, I might let you drop and smash you!"

"Chucka—chucka—chucka! Boo—oo—oo!" gobbled the baby, as if it were the best joke in the world.

Bootles positively roared.

"You don't mind? Well, come along, then," approaching very gingerly, and wondering where he should begin to get hold of it, so to speak.

The baby soon settled that question, holding out its arms towards his neck. Then somehow he gathered it up and carried it in doubt and trepidation to the big chair by the fire, where the creature sat contentedly upon his knee, the curly golden head resting against his scarlet jacket, the soft fingers of one baby hand tight twined round one of his, the other picking and wandering aimlessly about the scrolls and curves of the gold embroidery on his waistcoat.

"By Jove! you're a jolly little chap," said Bootles, just as if it could understand him. "But the question is, where did you come from, and what's to be done with you? You can't stop here, you know."

The babe's big blue eyes raised themselves to his, and the fingers which had been twined round his made a grab at his watch-chain.

"Gar—gar—garr—rah!" it remarked, in such evident delight that Bootles laughed again.

"Oh, you like it, do you? Well, you're a queer little beggar; no mistake about that. I wonder whom you belong to, and where you live when you are at home? Can't be a barrack child—too dainty-looking and not slobbery enough. And this dress"—taking hold of the richly embroidered white skirt—"this must have cost a lot; and it's all lace too."

He knew what embroidery cost by his own mess waistcoats and his tunics. Then not only was the dress of the child of a very costly description, but its sleeves were tied up with Cambridge blue ribbons that were evidently new, and its waist was encircled by a broad sash of the same material and tint. Altogether it was just such a child as he was occasionally called upon to admire in the houses of his married brother officers; yet that any lady in the regiment would lend her baby for a whole night to a set of harum-scarum young fellows for the purpose of playing a trick on a brother officer was manifestly absurd. And besides that, Bootles was so good-natured and such a favorite with the ladies of the regiment that he thought he knew all their babies by sight, and he became afraid that this one was indeed a little stranger in the land, welcome or unwelcome.

Yet if it was the fellows' doing, where had they got it? And if it was not the fellows' doing, why should any one leave a baby asleep in his cot? The whole thing was inexplicable.

Just then the child, in playing with his chain, slipped a little on the smooth cloth of his overalls, and Bootles, with a "Whoa! whoa, my lad!" hauled it up again. In doing so he felt a piece of paper rustle somewhere about the embroidered skirt.

"A note. This grows melodramatic," said Boot-les, craning his head to find it. "Oh, here we are! Now we shall see."

The note was written in a firm, large, yet thoroughly feminine hand, and ran thus:

"You will not absolve me from my oath of secrecy respecting our marriage, though now that I have offended you, I may starve or go to the work-house. I cannot break my oath, though you have broken all yours, but I am determined that you shall acknowledge your child. I am going to leave her to-night in your rooms with her clothes. By midnight I shall be out of the country. I do this because I have obtained a good situation, and because when I reach my destination I shall have spent my last shilling. I give you fair warning, however, that if you desert the child, or fail to acknowledge her, I will break my oath and proclaim our marriage. If you engage a nurse she will not be much trouble. She is a good and sweet-tempered child, and I have called her Mary, after your dear mother. Oh, how she would pity me if she could see me now! Farewell."

From that moment Bootles absolved "the fellows" from any share in the affair; but what to do with the child he had not the least idea.

"It is the very devil," he said aloud, watching the busy fingers still playing with his chain.

He gathered it awkwardly in his arms, and rose to look for the clothing spoken of in the letter. Yes, there it was, a parcel of goodly size, wrapped in a stout brown paper cover, and on the chair beside his cot lay the out-door garments of a young child — a white coat bordered with fur, a fur-trimmed cap, and some other things, which Bootles did not quite understand the use of; white wool fingerless gloves (at least he did not know what else they could be), and some longer things of the same class, like stockings without feet.

Bootles shook his head bewilderingly. "Mother means it to stop; I don't know what to do," he said, helplessly.

It occurred to him then that perhaps some of the fellows might be able to make a suggestion. He did not know what to do with the child for the night, nor, for the matter of that, what to do with it for the moment. He had the sense not to take it out into the chill midnight air, and when he attempted to put it back into the cot it rebelled, clinging to his watch-chain with might and main.

"Well, have it then," he said, slipping it off.

The baby, pleased with the glittering toy, set up a cry of delight, and Bootles took the opportunity of slipping out. He entered the anteroom with a very rueful face, finding it pretty much as he had left it. Lacy was the first to catch sight of him.

"Halloo, Bootles, what's the mat-tah?" he asked. "Is your head worse?"

"My head? Oh, I forgot all about it," Bootles replied. "But, I say, I'm in a mess. There's a baby in my room."

"A WHAT?" they cried, with one voice.

"A baby," repeated Bootles, dismally.

"Al—ive?" asked Lacy, with his head on one side.

"Alive! Oh, very, very much so, and means to stop, for it has brought its entire wardrobe and a letter of introduction with it," holding the letter for any one to take who chose. It was Lacy who did so, and he asked if he should read it up.

"Yes, do," said Bootles, dropping into a chair with a groan. "Perhaps some one else will own to it."

So Lacy read the letter in his ridiculous drawl of a voice, and ceased amid profound silence—"Fa-ah-well!"

"Well?" said Bootles, finding no one seemed inclined to speak. "Well?"

"Well," said Preston, solemnly, "if you want my opinion, Bootles, I think you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

A general laugh followed, but Bootles protested.

"Oh, don't imagine it's me. I've nothing to do with it. I shouldn't have come to you fellows if I had."

"No, no, of course not," returned Miles, promptly, but with an air which raised another shout.

"Then it's a plant," announced Preston, in a tone of conviction.

"Of course it's a plant," cried Bootles; "but why in the wide world should it be planted on me?"

"Why, indeed?" echoed Miles, feelingly.

"Besides," Bootles continued, "some of you know my mother, and that her name was not Mary but Margaret."

Now as several of those present had known Lady Margaret Ferrers very well, that was a strong point in favor of Preston's assertion that the affair was a plant. The chief question, however, was what could be done with the little stranger for that night. Some woman, of course, must look after it, but who? It was then after two o'clock, and the lights had been out hours ago in the married people's quarters. Bootles did not know what to do, and said so.

"Is it in your room now?" Preston asked.

"Yes."

"Where did you find it?"

"In my cot."

"The devil you did! I wonder you weren't frightened out of your very wits."

"I nearly was," Bootles admitted.

"Did you see it at once? Was it howling?"

"Howling? Not a bit of it. Never saw a jollier little beggar in all my life."

"Oh!" ejaculated Miles, blankly. "I say, you fellows, don't that sound to you very much like the proud pap—ah?"

"You fellows" all laughed at this, even perplexed Bootles, and Hartog asked a question.

"Did you see it directly, Bootles?"

"Oh no; not for half an hour or more."

"What on earth did you do?"

"Why, I looked at it of course. What would you have done?"

"Did you touch it?"

Bootles laughed. "Yes, by Jove, the little beggar came to me like a bird."

"Great gods!" uttered Miles, "and you can doubt the fatherliness of that!"

"Oh, what an ass you are!" returned Hartog; then, as if by a bright inspiration, suggested, "I say, let's go and have a look at it."

Thereupon the assembled officers, five of them, trooped along the way Bootles had stumbled over alone in the blindness of his now forgotten headache. The baby was still in the cot, contentedly playing with the watch and chain, and at the sight of the five resplendent figures it set up a loud "Boo—boo—boo—ing," followed by a "Chucka—chucka—chucka—ing." Evidently it considered this was the land of Goshen.

"Seems to take after its mother in its love for a scarlet jacket," remarked Miles, sententiously. "I've heard that the child is father of the man—seems of the woman too."

"Bootles," said Lacy, gravely, "isn't it very pwretty?"

"Yes, poor little beggar."

"Let's see you nurse it," cried Hartog.

So Bootles, proud of this new accomplishment, lifted the child awkwardly in his arms, pretty much as he might have done if it had been a sackful of eggs, and he had made a wager he wouldn't break one of them. He carried it to the fire.

"LET'S GO AND HAVE A LOOK AT IT."

"Just light the candles, one of you," he said.

"It's the image of Bootles," persisted Miles.

"Well, it isn't mine, except by deed of gift," returned Bootles, with a laugh.

"Bootles," said Lacy, "look back over your past life—" Here he made a pause.

"Well?" said Bootles, expectantly.

"Twry to think if you can twrace any likeness to some early love, who may have marwried—or, for that matter, not have marwried — some one else, and—er—wremembering your kind heart—for you have a dashed kind heart, Bootles, there's no denying it—may have found herself hard up or too much encumbered—for—er—you know, a babay is sometimes an awkward addition to a lady's belongings — and may have twrusted to your—er—general—well, shall we say softness of chawracter to see it well pwrovided for—er—see?"

"No, I don't. Of course I see what you mean, but I can't—"

"Well—er—" Lacy broke in, "I—er—pewraps was not thinking so much of your case as of my own. You see," appealing to the other three, "the advent of this—er—babay cwreates a precedent, and—er—if it should chance to occur to my first love—it would be awkward—for me, very awkward. Her name," plunging headlong into a story they all knew, "was Naomi, and—er—she—er—in fact, jilted me for an elephantine parson, whose reverend name was—er—Fligg, Solomon Fligg. Now, if Mrs.—er—Solomon Fligg was to take it into her head to pack up the—er—eleven little Fliggs and send 'em to me—it would be what I should call awkward—devilish awkward." Lacy's four hearers positively roared, and the baby on Bootles's knee chuckled and crowed with delight.

"I believe it understands," Preston laughed.

"No. But it seems a jolly little chap," answered Bootles. "Oh, I forgot, 'tis a girl. I say, I do wish you fellows would advise me what to do. How can I get any one to attend to it?"

"Oh, roll it up in the bedclothes and sleep on the sofa. It will go to sleep when it's tired," said one.

"With its clothes on?" said Bootles, doubtfully.

"I rather fancy they undress babies when they put 'em to bed."

"I don't advise you to try. Oh, it won't hurt for to-night."

BOOTLES, PROUD OF HIS NEW ACCOMPLISHMENT, LIFTED THE CHILD AWKWARDLY IN HIS ARMS.

"There's a cab just driven up. I believe it's the Grays. I saw them go out dressed before dinner," said Hartog. The Grays were the adjutant and his wife, who lived in barracks. "She would help you in a minute."

"Oh, go and see; there's a good chap," Bootles cried, eagerly.

Hartog therefore went out. He found that it was the adjutant with his wife returning from a party, and to the lady he addressed himself. "Oh, Mrs. Gray, Bootles is in such trouble—" he began.

"In trouble?—Bootles?—Captain Ferrers?" she said. "What is the matter?"

"Well, he's got a baby," Hartog answered.

"Got WHAT?" Mrs. Gray cried.

"A baby. It's been left in his rooms, clothes and all, and Bootles don't know what the de—, what in the world, I mean, to do with it."

"Shall I go in and see it?" Mrs. Gray asked.

"I wish you would. Some of the others are there."

Well, eventually Mrs. Gray carried off the little stranger to her own quarters, and put it to bed. As for Bootles, he too went to bed, but during the whole of that blessed night he never slept a wink.

Chapter II.

When Bootles showed his face in the mess-room the following morning he was greeted by such a volley of chaff as would have driven a more nervous man, or one less of a favorite than himself, to despair. Already the story had gone the round of the barracks, and Bootles found the greater part of his brother officers ready and willing to take Miles's view of the affair, whether in chaff or downright good earnest he could not say.

"Halloo! Bootles, my man," shouted one when he entered, "what's this story we hear? Is it possible that Bootles — our immaculate and philanthropical Bootles— Oh, Bootles! Bootles! how are the mighty fallen!"

"Hey?" inquired Bootles, sweetly.

"I wouldn't have believed it of you, Bootles; I wouldn't indeed. Any other fellow in the regiment—that soft-headed Lacy grinning over there, for instance—but our Bootles—" He broke off as if words could not express the volumes he thought, but found his tongue and went on again before Bootles could open his mouth. "Our Bootles with an unacknowledged wife sworn not to disclose her marriage—our Bootles with a baby—our Bootles a papa! Oh lor!"

"Why didn't you manage better, Bootles?" cried another. "You might have sent her an odd fiver now and then. You have plenty."

"Is she pretty, Bootles?" asked a third.

"Was there by any chance a flaw in the marriage?" inquired a fourth.

"Do you think I'm a fool?" asked Bootles, pleasantly. "I tell you it's a plant. I know nothing about the creature."

"Just my view," struck in Miles. "Just what I said last night. It's absurd, you know, to expect him to own it. No fellow would. Besides, does Bootles look like the father of a fine bouncing baby that goes 'Chucka, chucka, chuck?' It's absurd, you know."

Even Bootles joined in the laugh which followed, and Miles continued:

"The only thing is—and it really is awkward for Bootles — the extraordinary likeness. Blue eyes, golden hair, fair complexion. I should say myself"—looking at his comrade critically, "that at the same age Bootles was just such a baby as that which turned up so mysteriously last night."

"That's as may be. Any way, the youngster is not mine," said Bootles, emphatically; "and what to do with the little beggar I don't know."

"Send it back to its mother," suggested Dawson.

"But I don't know who the mother is," Bootles answered, impatiently.

"Oh no; so you say. Well, then, the brat must have growed, like Topsy. If I were you I should send it to the police-station."

"The police-station? Oh no; hang it all, the poor little beggar has done nothing to start the world in that way," Bootles answered.

"Did any of you," asked Miles of the general company, "ever hear of a chap called Solomon?"

"I—er—did," answered Lacy, promptly. "His other name was—er—Fligg. The Reverend Solomon Fligg."

"Oh, we've all heard of him! but I meant a rather more celebrated person. There is a story about him—I rather think it's in Proverbs"—eliciting a yell of laughter. "Not Proverbs? Well, perhaps it's in the Song of Solomon. It's about two mothers, who each had a baby, and one of them managed to smother hers in the night, and finding it dead when she woke up in the morning, claimed the other baby. Of course the other woman kicked up a row, a regular shindy, and they came before Solomon to get the matter settled. 'Both claim it,' said he. 'Oh, chop it in half, and let each have a share—' But you all know the rest. How the real mother gave up her claim sooner than see the child halved. Now in this case, you see, Bootles hasn't the heart to send the child off to the police-station, as he would if—"

"Here's the colonel," said some one at this point, and in less than two seconds he appeared.

"Why, Ferrers," he said, "I've been hearing a queer tale about you."

"Yes, sir," said Bootles, dismally; "and where it will end I don't know! Here am I saddled—"

"Well, of course you know whether the child has any claim upon you—" the colonel began.

"Upon my honor it has not, colonel," said Bootles, earnestly.

"Then that, of course, settles the question," replied the colonel, with a frown at the grinning faces along the table. "I should send the child to the workhouse immediately."

"The workhouse?" repeated Bootles, reflectively.

"I'll bet any one a fiver he don't," murmured Miles to his neighbors.

"Not he. Madame la Mère knew what she was doing when she picked out Bootles. He'll get one of the sergeants' wives to look after it; see if he don't."

After the chief had left the room, Bootles continued his breakfast in silence, considering the two suggestions for the disposal of the child. Now, if the truth be told, Bootles had a horror of workhouses. He had gone deeply into the "Casual" question, and pitied a tramp from the very inmost recesses of his kind heart. It fairly made him sick to think of that bonny golden head growing up among the shorn and unlovely locks of a pauper brood—to think of the little soft fingers that had twined themselves so confidently about his own, and had picked at the embroideries of his mess waistcoat, being slapped by the matron, or set as soon as they should be strong enough to do coarse and hard work, to develop into the unnaturally widened and unkempt hand of a "Marchioness"—to think of that little dainty thing being nourished on skilly, or on whatever hard fare pauper children are fed—to think of that little aristocrat being brought up among the children of thieves and vagabonds!

"Oh, confound it all," he broke out, "I can't."

"I never expected you could," retorted Miles. "It wouldn't be natural if you did."

This time Bootles did not laugh; on the contrary, he looked up and regarded Miles with a grave and searching gaze, rather disconcerting to that quizzical young gentleman.

"Are you judging me out of your own bushel?" he asked.

"How? What do you mean?" Miles stammered.

"Do you happen to know anything of the matter?" Bootles persisted.

"I? Oh no. On my honor I don't."

"Ah! As the colonel said just now, that settles the question. You're a very witty fellow, Miles, very. I shouldn't wonder, after a while, if you ain't quite the sharp man of the regiment. Only your jokes are like the clown's jokes at the circus—one gets to know them. They're in this kind of way:

"'Ever been in Paris, Mr. Lando?'

"'Yes, of course, Bell.'

"'Ever been in Vienna, Mr. Lando?'

"'To be sure, Bell.'

"'Ever been in Geneva, Mr. Lando?'

"'Of course I have, Bell.'

"'Ever been in jail, Mr. Lando?'

"'Of course I have, Bell—at least—that's to say—I mean—no, of course I haven't.'

"'Why, Mr. Lando, I saw you there.'

"'You saw me in jail, Bell? And what were you doing to see me?'

"'Oh!' grandly, 'I was staying with the governor for the good of my 'ealth.'

"'And hadn't stealing a cow something to do with it, eh, Bell?'

"'Yah. Who stole a watch?'

"'A Jersey cow, eh, Bell?'

"'Yah. What time is it, Mr. Lando?'

"'Just about milking time, Bell, my friend.'

"It's all very funny once, you know, Miles," Bootles ended, disdainfully. "But when you've been to the circus half a dozen times you don't see anything to laugh at, somehow."

For grace's sake Miles was obliged to laugh, for every one else roared, except Bootles, who went on speaking very gravely:

"I know it's very amusing to make a joke of the affair, to say I know more about it than I will confess. I have told the colonel on my honor that the child is not mine, nor do I know whose it is. If it were mine I should not have made the story public property—it's not in reason that I should. My difficulty is what to do with it. The colonel suggests the workhouse, Dawson the police-station—one simply means the other, and I can't bring me to do it. It is an awful thing for the child of a tramp or a thief to be reared in a workhouse—and this is no common person's child. For anything I know it may belong to one of you."

"That's true enough," observed a man who had not yet taken part in the discussion, except to laugh now and then. "But remember, Bootles, if you saddle yourself with the child you will have to go on with it. It will stick to you like a burr, and though we are all ready to accept your word of honor, the world may not be so. If you put the brat out to nurse in the regiment, the story may crop up years hence, just when you least desire or expect it; and, you know, a story—mixed and confused by time and repetition — about a deserted wife may come to have a very ugly sound about it. Now if, as the colonel suggests, you send the child to the workhouse, you wash your hands of the whole business. Then, again, if the brat is brought up in the regiment, with the disadvantage of your protection, what will she be in twenty years' time? Neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. Far better the oblivion of pauperism than the distinction among the men of being Captain Ferrers's—shall we say protégée?"

"Yes, there's a great deal in that," Bootles admitted. He had at all times a great respect for Harkness, and profound faith in the soundness of his judgment. He saw at once that any plan of bringing the child up among the married people of the regiment would not do, and yet—the workhouse.

He rose from the table and settled his forage cap upon his head. "I dare say you fellows will laugh at me," he said, almost desperately, as he pulled the chin-strap over his mustache, "but I can't condemn that helpless thing to the workhouse—I can't, and that's all about it. It seems to me," he went on, rubbing the end of his whip on the back of a chair, and looking at no one—"it seems to me that the child's future in this world and the next depends upon the course I take now. And you may laugh at me—I dare say you will," he said, quite nervously for him—"but I shall get a proper nurse to take charge of it, and I shall keep it myself until some one turns up to claim it —or—or for good."

Just then officers'-call sounded, and Bootles made a clean bolt of it, leaving his brother officers staring amazedly at one another. The first of them to make a move was Lacy—the first, too, to speak.

"Upon my soul," said he, "Bootles is a devilish fine fellow; and, d—— it all," he added, getting very red, and scarcely drawling, in his intense rage of admiration, "if there were a few more fellows in the world like him, it would be a vewry diffewrent place to what it is."

Chapter III.

As soon as Bootles had a spare moment he made his way to the adjutant's quarters, where he found Mrs. Gray playing with the mysterious baby.

"Oh, is that you, Captain Ferrers?" she exclaimed. "Come and see your waif. She is the dearest little thing. Why, I do believe she knows you."

Bootles whistled to the child, which promptly made a grab at his chain, and when he sat down on the sofa on which it was sprawling, tried very hard to get at the gold badge on his collar. Shoulder badges had not then come in.

"Mrs. Gray," Bootles said, "she's very well dressed, is she not?"

"Oh, very," Mrs. Gray answered, smoothing out the child's skirt so as to display the fine and deep embroidery. "Unusually so. All its clothes are of the finest and most expensive description."

"I thought so; it doesn't look like a common child, eh?"

"Not at all," replied the lady, promptly.

"Well," Bootles told her, "I've been most unmercifully chaffed, which was only to be expected; but the colonel takes my word about it, and of course the others don't matter. I can't think, though, why the mother has chosen me."

"Ah, well, you see, Captain Ferrers," said the adjutant's wife, with a smile, "it is rather inconvenient sometimes to have a character for great kindness of heart. I should say you are the greatest favorite in the regiment, and, naturally enough, the officers speak of it sometimes in society. 'Oh, Bootles is this, and Bootles is that;' 'Bootles wouldn't turn a dog from his door;' 'Bootles would share his last sixpence with a poor chap who was down,' and so on. I have heard, Captain Ferrers, of your emptying your pockets to divide among three poor tramps who had begged no more than a pipe of tobacco. I have heard of your standing up for"—with a deeper smile—"the poor devils of casuals; and if I hear it, why not others? why not the mother of this child?"

"True. But I think you all overrate my character," Bootles replied, modestly. "You know I don't go in for being saintly at all."

"That is just it. If you did you would have no more influence than Major Allardyce, whom every one laughs at. But you don't; you are one of themselves, and yet you will always help a man who is down; you will do any unfortunate creature a good turn. Oh, I hear a good deal, though you choose to make light of it. And you know, Captain Ferrers, we are not told that the good Samaritan made a great spluttering about what he did; but the professional saints, the priest and the Levite, passed by on the other side."

"You are very complimentary," Bootles said, blushing a little; "much more than I deserve, I'm sure. The fellows"—laughing at the remembrance—"were much less merciful. Then about the child. Dawson suggests sending it to the police-station, the colonel to the workhouse; and one means the other, of course."

Mrs. Gray caught the child to her breast with a cry of dismay, and Bootles went on:

"Yes, I feel as you do about it. I can't do it, and that's all about it. It would be on my conscience all my life. Besides, some day the mother might come back for it, and though of course, as the colonel says, there is no claim upon me, yet, if for the sake of a few pounds I had turned the poor little beggar adrift, ruined its life—why I simply couldn't face her, and that's all about it. And besides that, Mrs. Gray, I have a lurking suspicion that the letter is genuine, and that it was not written to or intended for me. It reads to me like the letter of a woman who was desperate."

"Yes, a woman must have been desperate indeed to willingly part with such a child as that," said Mrs. Gray, smoothing the gold baby curls.

"So I think, for nature is nature all the world over," Bootles answered. "And besides, to tell you the honest truth, there is a resemblance in the child to some one I knew once—"

"Yes?" eagerly.

"Oh no, not that! She is dead. She was engaged to a fellow I knew, desperately fond of him, and he—jilted her."

"Mr. Kerr?"

Bootles stared. "Who told you?"

"He told me himself, I think to ease his mind," she answered, quietly.

"Ah! Well, it killed her. She died heart-broken. I saw her," he said, rising and going to the window, whence he stood staring out over the square, "a few hours after she died. That child's mother may look like that now, and I can't and won't turn it adrift, whatever the fellows or any one else chooses to think or say, and that's all about it."

Two bright tears gathered in Mrs. Gray's eyes, and falling, fell upon the baby's curls of gold, two priceless diamonds from the unfathomable and exhaustless mines of pity. For a moment or two there was silence, broken at last by the child's laugh, as a ray of sickly winter sunshine fell upon the glittering chain in its little hands. The sound recovered Bootles, who turned from the window.

"And so, Mrs. Gray," he said, carefully avoiding the gaze of her wet eyes, "I have determined to keep the little beggar; but Harkness, who's no fool, you know, has convinced me that it won't do to trust to any of the barrack women to look after her. Therefore, if you won't mind undertaking it for a few days, I will advertise for a respectable elderly nurse to take entire charge of the creature. I dare say I can arrange with Smithers for an extra room, and you'll let me come to you for advice now and then, won't you?"

Mrs. Gray rose and went close to him, laying her hand upon his arm. "Captain Ferrers," she said, earnestly, "you will have your reward. God will bless you for this."

MRS. GRAY ROSE AND WENT CLOSE TO HIM, LAYING HER HAND UPON HIS ARM.

"Oh, please don't, Mrs. Gray," Bootles stammered. "Really I'd rather you'd chaff me."

Mrs. Gray laughed outright. "Well, you know what my sentiments are, so for the future I will chaff you unmercifully.—Come in," she added, in a louder tone, as a "tap-tap" sounded on the door.

The permission was followed by the entrance of Lacy, who came in with a pleasant "Good—er—morning," and a soft laugh at the sight of the baby on the sofa.

"I—er—thought old Bootles would be here," he explained. "And besides—I—er—wanted to see the babay. Seems to me, Bootles," he added, staring with an absurd air of reflective wisdom at the infant, "as if the face is somehow familiar to me. Oh, I don't mean you. It isn't a bit like you. But there is a likeness, though I don't know where to plant it."

"Perhaps it will grow," suggested Bootles.

"Ah! pewraps it will, and pewraps it won't. The worst of the affair is that it is cwreating a pwrecedent"—not for worlds would he have admitted to his friend that he thought him the fine fellow he had declared him in the mess-room that morning—"and if we are all inundated with ba-bays I wreally don't know" (plaintively) "what the wregiment will come to."

"Gar—ah—gar—ah!" chuckled the subject of this speech over the gold knob at the top of Lacy's whip. "Cluck—cluck—cluck!"

"Little beggah seems to find it a good joke, any way," Lacy cried. "I'm a gwreat hand at nursing. Our adjutant's wife in the White Dwragoons had thwree—all at once. I say, Mrs. Gwray, stick something on it, and I'll take it out and show it wround."

"Dare you?" she asked.

"Dawre I? Just twry. By-the-bye, it's cold this morning—vewry cold."

Mrs. Gray therefore fetched the child's white coat and cap and those other white woollen articles, which Bootles now discovered to be leggings, and quickly transformed the little woman into a sort of snowball. The two men watched the operation with intense interest.

"La figlia del wreggimento," laughed Lacy. "I declare, Bootles, she's quite a credit to us. I never saw such a petite mademoiselle."

Bootles started. It reminded him who had been jilted by his friend and died for love. He had always called her Mademoiselle Mignon.

"Mademoiselle Mignon," he said, carelessly; "not a bad name for her."

"Vewry good," returned Lacy, preparing to present arms.

He proved himself a much better nurse than Bootles. He gathered the child on his left arm and marched off to the anteroom, in front of which the officers were standing about, waiting for church. They set up a shout at the sight of him, and crowded round to inspect the new importation. Mademoiselle Mignon bore the inspection calmly, conscious perhaps—as she was such a knowing little person—of the effect of her big, blue, star-like eyes under the white fur of her cap.

"What a pity she ain't twenty years older!" was the first comment, and it was said in such a tone of genuine regret that all the fellows laughed again. Miss Mignon gobbled with satisfaction.

"Seems a jolly little beggar," said another.

"Chut—chut—chut!" remarked Miss Mignon.

"Never saw such a jolly little beggar in all my life," asserted another voice.

"Pretty work she'll make in the regiment sixteen or seventeen years hence," grumbled old Garnet.

"Ah, well, nevah mind, Garnet—nevah you mind, Major Garnet, sir," cried Hartog, "we shall all be dead by then;" but this being an exceedingly old and threadbare regimental joke was instantly snubbed in the face of the new and substantial one.

"Has it any teeth?" demanded Miles, the orderly officer for the day.

"Don't know. Open your mouth, little one," said Lacy, gravely.

At this point Miss Mignon made a delighted lunge in the direction of the belt across Miles's breast. Lacy shouted, "Whoa, whoa," and Miles immediately backed out of reach. Miss Mignon's mouth went dismally down, until Lacy remembered the knob of his whip, and held it up for delectation.

"Boo—boo!" she crowed.

"By Jove! She can half say Bootles already," ejaculated Hartog. "And here he comes."

"Now, then," Bootles called out, "have any of you fellows made up your mind to own this little baggage?"

"No; none of us," they laughed; but one man, Gilchrist by name, said, with a sneer, he should rather think not, and added two unnecessary words —"workhouse brat!"

Bootles turned, and looked down upon him in profoundest contempt.

"My dear chap," he said, coolly, "to charge you with being the father of that child," pointing with his whip to the picture in Lacy's arms, "would be a compliment on your personal appearance which I should never, under any circumstances, have dreamed of paying you."

"I'll tell you what it is," said Hartog afterwards to Lacy, "Bootles is a dashed good fellow —one of the best fellows in the world. I don't know that there's another I'd trust as far or as thoroughly; but all the same, Bootles is sometimes best left alone, and, for my part, I think Gilchrist and every one else had best leave him alone about this youngster."

"Ya—as," returned Lacy; then began to laugh. "Oh! but it was fine, though, about 'personal appearance.'" And then he added, "Ugly little beast!"

Chapter IV.

It was not to be expected, and Bootles did not expect it, that the story of the mysterious little stranger could be confined to barracks. In fact, in the course of a few hours it had flown all over the town, gaining additions and alterations by the frequency of its repetition, until at last Bootles himself could hardly recognize it. A baby had been found in Captain Ferrers's rooms; no one knew where it had come from nor to whom it belonged. Then — Captain Ferrers had rescued a young baby from a brutal father who was going to dash its brains out against the door-post. Then—Captain Ferrers had picked up a new-born infant while hunting with the duke's hounds. Then—Captain Ferrers was suffering from mental aberration, or, to speak plainly, was getting a bit cracked, and had adopted a child a year old out of Idleminster workhouse. Then— It was really most romantic, but Captain Ferrers had been engaged to and jilted by a young lady long ago — which, of course, accounted for his being impervious to the fascinations of the Idleminster girls — who had married, been deserted by her husband, and now died — some versions of the story said "committed suicide"—leaving him the charge of a baby, etc.

Some people told one version of the story and some people told another, but nobody blamed Bootles very much. It might be because he was so rich and so handsome and pleasant; it might be because Idleminster society was free from that leaven of censoriousness which causes most people to look at most things from the worst possible view.

But Bootles went on his serene way, telling the true state of the case to every one who mentioned the affair to him, and always ending, "And hang it, you know, it's a pretty little beggar, and I couldn't send it to the workhouse."

He made no secret about it at all, and on the Saturday following the advent of the child an advertisement appeared in the Idleminster Chronicle which made Idleminster tongues clack for a week:

"Wanted, immediately, a highly respectable and thoroughly experienced nurse of middle age, to take the entire charge of a child about a year old. Good wages to a suitable person. Apply to Captain Ferrers, Scarlet Lancers."

In due time this advertisement produced the right sort of person, and a staid and respectable widow of about fifty was soon installed in a room next to Mr. Gray's quarters, in charge of Miss Mignon, as the child had already come to be called by everybody.

It was a charming child—strong and healthy, seemed to have no trouble with temper or teeth, hardly ever cried, and might be seen morning and afternoon being wheeled by its nurse in a baby-carriage about the barrack square or along the road outside the Broad Arrow boundaries. And so, as the weeks rolled by and wore into months, it began to toddle about, and could say "Bootles" as plain as a pike-staff.

In April the Scarlet Lancers were moved from Idleminster to Blankhampton, where Bootles had to undergo a new experience, for every one there took him for a widower on account of the child.

Bootles would explain. "Take her about with me? Yes; she likes it. Always wants to go when she sees the trap. A bother? Not a bit of it; the jolliest little woman in creation, and as good as gold. What am I going to do with her when she grows up? Well, Lacy says he is going to marry her. If he don't, somebody else will—no fear."

Taking it all round, Miss Mignon had a remarkably good time of it, and seemed thoroughly to appreciate the pleasant places in which her lines had fallen. It was wonderful, too, what an immense favorite she was with "the fellows." At first she had been "Bootles's brat," but very soon that was dropped, and by the time she could toddle, which she did in very good time, no one thought of mentioning her or of speaking to her except as "Miss Mignon." Scarcely any of the officers dreamed for a moment of returning after a few days' leave without "taking along," as the Americans say, a box of sweets or a bundle of toys for Miss Mignon. Indeed the young lady came to have such a collection that after a while Mrs. Nurse's patient soul arose, and with Captain Ferrers's permission all the discarded ones were distributed among the less fortunate children of the regiment.

But Miss Mignon's favorite plaything was Bootles himself—after Bootles, Lacy. People said it was wonderful, the depth of the affection between the big soldier of thirty-five and the little dot of a child, scarcely two. Bootles she adored, and where Bootles was she would be, if by hook or by crook she could convey her small person into his presence. Once she spied him turn in at the gates on the right hand of the colonel, when the regiment was returning from a field-day, and escaping from her nurse's hand, set off as hard as she could run in the direction of the band, which immediately preceded the commanding officer. Mrs. Nurse gave chase, but alas! Mrs. Nurse was stout, and had the ill luck, moreover, to come a cropper over a drain tile lying conveniently in her way, while the child, unconscious of danger, ran straight for Bootles. Neither Bootles nor Lacy, who was on the colonel's left, perceived her until she was close upon them, waving her small hands, and shouting, in her shrill and joyous child's voice, "Bootles! Bootles!"

It seemed to Bootles, as he looked past the colonel, that the child was almost under the hoofs of Lacy's charger. "Lacy!" he called out—"Lacy!" But Lacy was already on the ground, and caught Miss Mignon out of harm's way; but when he turned round he saw that his friend's face was as white as chalk.

BUT LACY WAS ALREADY ON THE GROUND, AND CAUGHT MISS MIGNON OUT OF HARM'S WAY.

As for the colonel, when he saw Mrs. Nurse gathering herself up with rueful looks at the drain tile, he simply roared, and Miss Mignon chimed in as if it were the finest joke in the world.

"That was a smash," she remarked, from her proud position on Lacy's shoulder, "just like Humpty Dumpty"—a comment which gave that estimable person the name of Mrs. Humpty Dumpty as long as she remained with the regiment.

A few weeks after this the annual inspection came off, and Miss Mignon, resenting the lengthened absence of her Bootles, again managed to escape from her nurse, and pattered boldly, as fast as her small feet would carry her, right into the mess-room, where Bootles was sitting, just opposite the general, at the late lunch. Miss Mignon not seeing him at first, wandered coolly behind the row of scarlet-clad backs, until she spied him at the other side of the table. Then, having no awe whatever of inspecting officers, she wedged herself in between his chair and the colonel's with a triumphant and joyous laugh.

The general gave a great start, and the colonel laughed. Bootles, in dismay, jumped up, and came quickly round the table to take her away.

"Well, you little rogue," said the colonel, reaching a nectarine for her. "What do you want?"

"I wanted Bootles, sir," said Miss Mignon, confidentially. "And nurse falled asleep, so I tooked French leave." Almost the only peculiarity in her speech was the habit of making all verbs regular.

"And who are you, my little maid?" the general asked, in extreme amusement.

"Oh, I'm Miss Mignon," with dignity.

The old general fairly chuckled with delight, and as he had put his arm round the child, Bootles, who was standing behind, could not very well take her away.

"Oh, Miss Mignon—hey? And whom do you belong to?"

"Why, to Bootles," in surprise at his ignorance.

"To Bootles? And who is Bootles?"

"Bootles is Bootles, and I love him," Miss Mignon replied, as if that settled everything.

"Happy Bootles!" cried the old soldier.

"What a lot of medals you've got!" cried Miss Mignon, pressing closer.

"I'm afraid, sir, she is troubling you," Bootles interposed at this point, but secretly delighted with the turn affairs had taken.

"WHAT A LOT OF MEDALS YOU'VE GOT!"

"No, no; let her see my medals," replied the general, who was as proud of his medals as Bootles of Miss Mignon.

"Are you a 'sir' too?" Miss Mignon asked, gazing at the handsome old man with more respect.

"What does she mean?" he cried.

Bootles laughed.

"Well, sir, she hears us speak to the colonel so, that is all."

"Dear me! What a remarkably intelligent and attractive child!" exclaimed the general, quietly. "How old is she?"

"About two, sir."

Now it happened that the old general had a craze for absolute accuracy, and he caught Bootles up with pleasant sharpness.

"Oh! Does that mean more or less?"

"I can't say, sir. She is about two. I do not know the date of her birth."

"Then she is not yours?"

"I am not her father, sir, but at present she belongs to me," Bootles said, smiling. "I'm afraid—"

"Not at all, but perhaps she had better go. What a charming child!" This last was perhaps because Miss Mignon, finding her time had come —and she never made a fuss on such occasions— put two soft arms round his neck, and gave him such a genuine hug of friendship that the old man's heart was quite taken by storm.

So Miss Mignon was carried off, looking back to the last over Bootles's shoulder, and waving her adieu to the handsome old man, who had such a fascinating array of clasps and medals.

"I didn't quite understand — what relation is the child to him?" he asked of the colonel.

"None whatever. Ferrers found her late one night in his bed, with her wardrobe, and a letter from the mother, written as if Ferrers was the father. He, however, gave me his word of honor that he knew nothing about it, and some of us think the whole affair was simply a plant, as he is known to be a very kind-hearted fellow. Others, however, Ferrers among them, think that note and child were intended for one of the others. Nobody, however, would own to it, and Ferrers has kept the child ever since—I don't suppose he would part with her now for anything. I wanted him to send her to the workhouse, but 'tis a jolly bright little soul, and I am glad he did not."

"Then he is not married?"

"Oh dear no. He pays a woman fifty pounds a year to look after her, and all her meals go from the mess. In fact, he is bringing her up as if she were his own; and the child adores him—simply adores him."

"I respect that man," said the general, warmly. "It is an awful thing for a child to be reared in a workhouse—awful."

"Yes; Bootles feels very strongly on the subject," replied the colonel, absently.

By the time Bootles returned, the officers had risen from the table, and he met the guests and the seniors just entering the anteroom.

"I'll shake hands with you, Captain Ferrers, if you please," said the general, cordially. "I agree with you that it is an awful thing for a child to be brought up in a workhouse. It is a subject upon which I feel very strongly—very strongly. A child reared as a pauper does not start the world with a fair chance. I have met so often, in the course of my military experience, with recruits bred in the Unions—I never knew one do well. No; pauperism is ground into them, and they are never able to shake it off."

"Well, sir, that is my opinion," said Bootles, modestly. "I hope, though, you won't think my little maid is often so obtrusive as to-day. She is really always very good."

"A charming little child," replied the general, as if he meant it too, and then he shook hands with Bootles again.

Chapter V.

There was only one blot in the sweetness and light of Miss Mignon's baby character, so far as the officers of the Scarlet Lancers were concerned. Among them all there was only one whom she did not like. She had degrees of love—Bootles ranked first, then Lacy, then two or three groups of friends whom she liked best, better, and well; but she had no degrees of dislike where she did not love. She hated, hated fiercely and furiously, hated with all her baby heart and soul. There were several persons in her small world whom she detested thus, absolutely declining to hold communication or to accept overtures from them, however sweetly made; but there was only one of the officers who came under this head, and he was Gilchrist, the man who had dubbed her at first workhouse brat. Miss Mignon could not endure him. When old enough to understand that a certain box of sweeties had come from Mr. Gilchrist, she would drop it as if it burned her fingers, draw down the corners of her mouth, and remark, "Miss Mignon is very much obliged;" an observation which invariably sent Bootles and Lacy off into fits of laughter, at which the little maid would fly open-armed to him, and cry, "But Mignon loves Bootles." But the fact remained the same, that Miss Mignon detested Gilchrist, who, indeed, was not a favorite in the regiment. Nor, indeed, did Gilchrist seem to like Miss Mignon any better, though he now and then brought his offerings of toys and bonbons like the rest. In the face of Bootles's severe snub about the two odious words he had applied to her, he was hardly such a simpleton as to further rouse or annoy the most popular man in the regiment; yet if he could possibly cast a slur on Bootles or on the child he did it. Never from his lips came the pet name "Miss Mignon," never did his black eyes rest on her without a sneer or a jibe; if he could by any chance twist Bootles's words into an admission that the child was really his, he took care never to lose the opportunity.

"Oh, come, now," Preston cried one day, when he had been sneering at Bootles and Lacy, who had just driven away with the child between them, "Bootles is a right good sort—no mistake on that point. No sneaking hypocrisy about him. It would be well for you and me if we were half as fine chaps; but we are not, Gilchrist, and, what is more, we never shall be."

"Oh no; but where is the mother of that brat?"

"How should I know? or Bootles? I shouldn't mind laying my life that Bootles never did and never will cause her or any other woman to write such a letter as came with the child that night. Jolly good thing for this one if she was Bootles's wife, instead of being tied up to the hound who bound her to secrecy and deserted her. Perhaps she's dead, poor soul! Who knows?"

"Perhaps she isn't," Gilchrist sneered. "Some people never die."

Good-natured and not very wise Preston stared at him, and Hartog looked from behind his newspaper, aghast at the bitterness of his tone.

"Good heavens, Gilchrist!" Preston cried, "are you wanting somebody to die?"

Gilchrist tried to laugh, and succeeded very badly. He rose from his chair, knocking a few scattered cigar ashes carefully off his braided cuff.

"Well, I confess I should not be sorry to see that prating brat of Bootles's out of the road. We should perhaps get at the truth then." And having delivered himself of this feeling speech, he went out, banging the door after him.

"Well, upon my soul!" exclaimed Preston.

"Oh, the man's got a tile loose in his upper story," said Hartog, decidedly. "No man in his senses would talk such miserable rot as that. Always thought Gilchrist a crazy fool myself, but I'm sure of it now."

"And how he sticks to it Miss Mignon is Bootles's own child—as if it could be any good for him to say she isn't if she is."

"No. I shall tell Bootles to keep an eye on Gilchrist. I say, what a comfort it would be if he would only exchange! I suppose we can't manage to dazzle him with the delights of India, eh?"

"Not very well. Besides, he lost ever so much seniority by coming to us."

"No such luck. It's queer, though, he should be so persistent about Bootles and Miss Mignon. I suppose he wants to daub Bootles with some of his own mud. Thinks if he only throws enough, some of it's sure to stick; and so it would with most men. Happily, however, it don't in the least matter what a little cad like Gilchrist chooses to say about a man like Bootles — a jealous little beast."

Neither of them said any more about the matter, but Hartog took the earliest opportunity of repeating to Bootles what "that ass Gilchrist" had said about seeing that prating brat of Bootles's out of the road, and in consequence a kind of watch was set upon the child. Not that Bootles, though he had a very poor opinion of Gilchrist and Gilchrist's brains, was afraid for a moment that he would give Miss Mignon poisoned bonbons, or run off with her and drop her in the river; yet he did think it not improbable that he might encourage an already dangerous spirit of adventure, and of course be absolutely blameless if she could get trampled by a horse's cruel hoofs, or crushed by one of the many traps going in and out of barracks.

When Bootles had taken his first long leave after Miss Mignon's coming, he had left her at Idleminster in charge of her nurse; but when long leave came round again, and she must have been about two and a half, he decided to take her with him. One reason for this was certainly a fear of any pranks Gilchrist might choose to play, another that Lacy was taking his leave at the same time, and Bootles was afraid, in the absence of both, Miss Mignon might fret herself into a fever. And, besides, he had missed the child during a fortnight's deer-stalking in Scotland that autumn more than he would have liked to own.

From Blankhampton, therefore, they went to his place, Ferrers Court, where he was to entertain a rather large party for Christmas, with a sister of his mother's, and his only near relative, to do the honors for him, and among his guests a Mrs. Smith, a widow, and sister to that dead girl to whom he fancied a resemblance in Miss Mignon. However, at the last moment, Mrs. Smith wrote to excuse herself.

"I am very, very sorry," she said, "but a very dear friend of mine, with whom I spent two winters in Italy, has suddenly appeared, with a travelling companion and two maids, to pay me a long-promised visit of at least two months. She is a Russian countess—a widow like myself, and wishes, I fancy, to improve her English, which she already speaks very well. Of course I am dreadfully disappointed, but cannot help it."

Now it happened that Bootles had a very deep and great respect and liking for Mrs. Smith, and not for all the widowed countesses in Russia was he willing to upset his plans; therefore he wrote off at once to Mrs. Smith, after a five minutes' consultation with Lady Marion, to beg her to carry out her original intentions, and bring Madame and her retinue "along." Would she telegraph her reply?

Mrs. Smith did so, the reply being, Yes. Moreover, she supplemented the telegram by a letter, in which she mentioned among other things that Madame Gourbolska's travelling companion must be treated in all ways as an ordinary guest.

So, at the time originally appointed for Mrs. Smith's coming, the party of six—three ladies and three maids—arrived. Bootles himself went to the station to meet them. He found that Madame Gourbolska was young, not more than thirty, of the plump and fair Russian type, quite fair enough to hold her own beside Mrs. Smith, whom he regarded as the most beautiful woman of his acquaintance. The third lady, Miss Grace, was fair also, perhaps not so positively beautiful as either the English or the Russian lady, but fair-haired, fair-skinned, with soft blue-gray eyes, intensely blue in some lights, as Bootles noticed directly. Graceful she was to a degree, and as he watched her move across the little station he thought how wonderfully her name suited her.

Mrs. Smith smiled at him as he helped her to mount to the top of the omnibus. "Is not the likeness wonderful?" she said, with one of those quick sighs with which we speak of our dead; and then she said, "Poor Rosy."

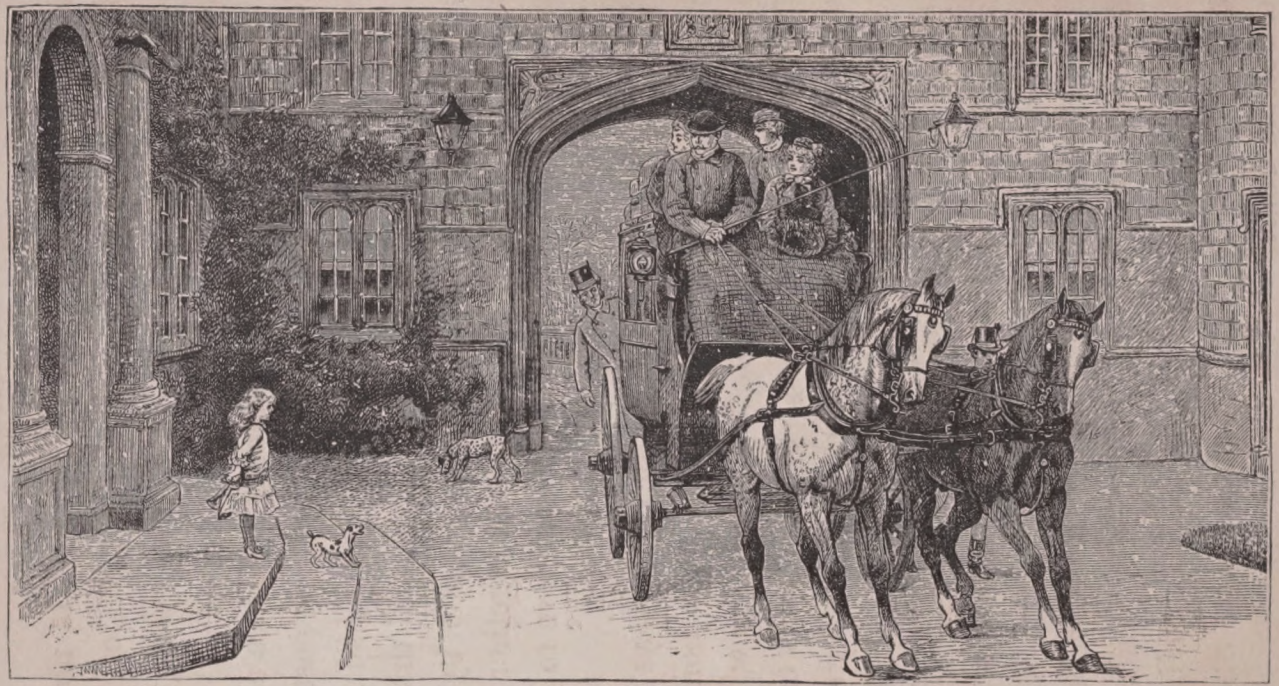
Bootles turned and looked at Miss Grace again, his mind going back to those dark days, past and gone now, when he and his best friend had been estranged for honor's sake; when he and this imperially beautiful woman had stood side by side watching a young life die out; had together seen the sacrifice of a heart, the martyr of love to man.

"Yes, it is very great," he said, briefly.

That dead sister of Mrs. Smith had always been and would always be a not-to-be-broken bond of union between them, for the widow knew how gladly "that grand Bootles," as she always called him, would have tried to make up for the love she had lost, while to Bootles Mrs. Smith stood out from the rest of womankind as the sister of the only woman he had ever wished or asked to marry him.

He helped Miss Grace up to the seat beside Mrs. Smith, and took his own place beside the Russian lady, who entertained him very well during the three miles' drive between Eagles Station and Ferrers Court.



IN ANOTHER MOMENT THEY HAD DRAWN UP AT THE GREAT GOTHIC DOOR-WAY.

"Oh, but what a paradise!" she cried, as the carriage turned into the court-yard.

"I am delighted that it pleases you," he answered, glancing round to see what effect his ancestral home had upon Miss Grace.

"Lovely!" she murmured to Mrs. Smith.

In another moment they had drawn up at the great Gothic door-way, and immediately the figure of a little child dressed in white appeared on the top of the broad steps, kissing her small hands in token of welcome.

"Go in directly; you'll get cold. Go in, I say," Bootles called out. It was, indeed, bitterly cold, and a few flakes of snow were falling. But Miss Mignon had a budget of news for her Bootles, and was not to be done out of telling it.

"Lal has had a letter from home," she piped out in her shrill voice. Lal was her name for Lacy, and home meant Blankhampton Barracks. "And the St. Bernard has gotted two puppies—beauties—and I'm to have one. Lal says so. And Terry has broked his leg." Terry was one of Bootles's grooms. "And Major Ally's going to be married"

Bootles was so surprised that he forgot the cold and his order that Miss Mignon should go in.

"What!" he exclaimed, incredulously.

Just then Lacy himself came to the top of the steps with open arms, so to speak, and carried off Mrs. Smith into the house. Miss Mignon took advantage of the opportunity to run down the steps just as Bootles helped Madame Gourbolska to the ground.

"I welcome you with much pleasure," he said, cordially—"Miss Grace also," as he gave her his hand to jump the last step. "I am afraid you are tired. You are very white."

"I am tired," she said, in a low voice, not looking at him, but at the child.

"It is so bitterly cold. Don't stand a moment. Mignon, will you go in?"

Miss Mignon skipped up the steps, and the Russian lady caught her in her arms.

"Oh, you little angel! and what is your name?"

"I'm Miss Mignon. You're a very pretty lady," returned Mignon, critically. "I wanted to go to the station, but Bootles said it was too cold, and Lal—"

"Madame does not know what Bootles and Lal mean," interrupted Bootles.

"This is Bootles, and that's Lal," Miss Mignon informed her. "I'm Miss Mignon, and I belong to Bootles."

"Oh, you belong to Bootles. I am sure he must be very proud of you," Madame answered.

"I believe I'm a great bother to him," Miss Mignon announced, in a matter-of-fact tone.

Bootles laughed. "Come to the fire, Madame," he said. Then turning to Miss Grace, "I'm sure you are very cold — you are as white as a ghost. I'm sure," addressing Lady Marion, "Aunt Marion, wine would be much better than this tea."

"No, no; tea," they cried — at least the two elder ladies, for Miss Grace seemed to have no ears for any one but the child.

"Won't you speak to me?" she asked, presently, as Miss Mignon gravely regarded her with her big blue eyes.

Miss Mignon went close to her immediately. "Did Bootles let you drive?" she asked, with interest.

Miss Grace shook her head, and lifted Miss Mignon onto her knee. "I did not ask him," she said.

"Oh!" Then, after a pause, "I al—ways do."

"But not a pair?" in surprise.

Miss Mignon nodded. "When they're not too fresh. Bootles would have letted you, if you'd asked him."

"I will another time."

"Lacy," said Bootles, suddenly, "is it true about Allardyce?"

"Hartog says so. They say she — er — dwrinks like a duck."

"Pooh!" But Bootles laughed as if it was a great joke, and Mrs. Smith begged to be enlightened.

"Oh! don't you remember Allardyce? He's the great military teetotal light."

"And — er — he wreally is an AWFUL duf-fah," remarked Miss Mignon, in so exact and so unconscious an imitation of Lacy's drawl that her hearers went off into fits of laughter, and Miss Grace, clasping her close to her breast, bent, and kissed the luxuriant golden curls.

"You're crying," said Miss Mignon, promptly, scanning Miss Grace's face with her big eyes.

"No; but you made me laugh," she said, hastily.

"Some people do cry when they laugh," Miss Mignon informed her. "Our colonel does. Now Major Garnet always chokes, and then Bootles thumps him. I don't know what he'll do," she added, in a tone of deep concern, "if he chokes while we are away."

"I never saw such an original little piece of mischief in my life," cried Mrs. Smith. "And how charmingly dressed—is she not, Madame? So sensible of you to cover her up with that warm serge up to her throat and down to her wrists. Who put you up to it?"

"I fancy we evolved the idea among us. You see she runs in and out of my rooms, her own, and Mrs. Gray's, the adjutant's wife, that is," Bootles answered. "And barrack corridors are not exactly hot-houses. Besides, our doctor keeps his eye on her, and he blames the wrapping-up for her never having a day's illness."

"I believe in it," asserted Mrs. Smith.

"And I—oh! our married ladies tell me I am quite an authority on the subject. I can tell you we get fearfully chaffed about her, Lacy and I."

"Why?" Miss Grace asked.

"Well, because she goes about with us a good deal, and people seem to find the situation difficult to understand." He took it for granted that she knew all about Miss Mignon, and she did not press the question further. But half an hour later, when Mrs. Smith was thinking of dressing, Miss Grace tapped at her door and entered.

"Could you lend me a few black pins?" she asked. "Madame and I have both forgotten them."

"Certainly, my dear—take the box."

But Miss Grace only took a few in the pink palm of her hand.

"What a pretty child that is!" she said, carelessly. "Did the mother die when it was born?"

"Oh, my dear!" cried Mrs. Smith, "she is not Captain Ferrers's child. No relation whatever."

"No? Whose, then?"

"Ah! That is a question." Then she briefly told Miss Mignon's history, ending: "But he will never part with her now. He is so fond of her, and she adores him."

"He is a fine fellow," said Miss Grace, toying with the pins in her hand.

"A fine fellow! He is a splendid character," Mrs. Smith cried, warmly. "I assure you I have studied that man — and I have known him for years — and I cannot find a fault in him. Years ago, when we were in great trouble, my mother and I, at the time my sister died, oh, he was so good, so—well," with a quick sigh, "I cannot explain it all, but he was such a comfort to us, and she died, poor darling, under very painful circumstances, especially for me. Oh, there are very few in the world like him — not one in ten thousand. Take his action as regarded that dear little child, for instance. His brother officers wanted him to send her to the workhouse, but as he wrote to me, 'Some day I may meet the mother, and how should I face her?'"

"Ah!" murmured Miss Grace, and Mrs. Smith went on.

"It was no small undertaking for a man in his position, for he has not left her to the entire care of servants — she is continually with him and Mr. Lacy, who is also very fond of her. Do you know, he pays her nurse fifty pounds a year. In fact, she is just as if she were really his own child. But it is just like him."

"And they would have sent her to the workhouse?"

"One or two of them—not Mr. Lacy, of course."

Miss Grace was silent for a few moments. Then she roused herself as from a brown-study.

"Well, I am detaining you, Mrs. Smith, and shall be late myself. Thank you very much." Then she went away, passing softly down the corridor, and entered her room, locking the door behind her. But once in that safe shelter she flung the pins on the table and dropped upon her knees, burying her face in her hands, while the scalding tears forced their way between her fingers, and the great sobs shook her frame. "'Some day he might meet the mother,' she sobbed, 'and how should he face her?' Oh, my child, my little child, how shall I face him? How shall I bear it? How shall I live in the same house with him without falling on my knees and blessing him for saving my little child from—God knows what?"

LACY WAS OCCUPIED IN MAKING DESPERATE LOVE TO THE RUSSIAN LADY.

Chapter VI.

A month had passed, and the three ladies still remained at Ferrers Court, though other visitors had come and gone, lots of them. Lacy was still there also, and occupied in making desperate love to the Russian lady, utterly ignoring two important facts—one that she only laughed at him, the other that she was three years his senior.

But while all this was going on, Bootles had fallen in love at last, as men and women only fall once in their lives, and of course the lady was Madame Gourbolska's friend, Miss Grace—had he but known it, the mother of Mignon.

But Bootles never suspected that for a moment. True, there was a likeness so strong as to proclaim the truth, and many a time Miss Grace wondered, when she caught sight of the child's face and her own in a glass, that all these people did not see it. Yet neither Bootles nor any one else did see it, and the game of love was played on with desperate earnestness on his side, and with equally desperate desire to prevent it on hers.

But Bootles admired shy game, and Miss Grace's evident shyness made him only the more earnest; and not being troubled with that faint heart which never won fair lady, he had no intention of allowing Madame Gourbolska to depart from beneath his roof without asking Miss Grace to return to it as its mistress. Therefore one afternoon, when he returned from hunting in much bespattered pink, and went into the fire-lit library, where he found Miss Grace half dreaming by the fire, he shut the door with the intention of getting it over at once. Miss Grace rose with some signs of confusion.

"Don't go for a minute," said Bootles; "I want to speak to you. It seems to me that you have grown very fond of my little Mignon. Is it not so?"

Miss Grace caught at the carvings of the oaken chimney-shelf to steady herself, and her heart began to beat hard and fast.

"Yes, I am very fond of her," she stammered.

"I wish you would take her for your own," Bootles said, very gently.

"For — my own?" sharply. "What do you mean?"

For a moment she thought he knew all, but his next words undeceived her.

"If she had such a mother as you, poor little motherless waif, and if I had such a wife, and if Ferrers Court had such a mistress! Oh! don't you understand what I mean?" taking her hand.

Miss Grace snatched the hand away. "Oh, don't, don't, DON'T!" she said, turning away.

But Bootles possessed himself of it again. "Must I tell you more? Oh, my darling, how from the very first day I ever saw you I loved you with all my heart and soul? How, when I bade you welcome to my house, I could, and would if I had dared, have taken you up to my heart and kissed you before every one? How—"

"Oh, tell me nothing—nothing!" she cried, with feverish haste. "Don't you understand it cannot be? it is impossible—quite impossible."

"Impossible!" he echoed, blankly. "Why is it impossible? Not because you don't care, that I'll swear."

She said nothing.

"Or, if that is so, look at me and say I don't love you."

But Miss Grace did not speak, nor yet did she look.

"Or will you tell me that there is some one else whom you like better?" he asked, regaining hope.

No, Miss Grace did not seem inclined to vouchsafe that information either.

"Or that the care of the child would be an objection?"

"No!" she burst out, in an agonized tone.

"Then what do you mean by impossible?" he asked. "It seems to me very possible indeed."

She looked at him—that proud, handsome, erect man, with a smile of expectant happiness on his good face—and tried to take her hands away.

"Oh!" she sobbed out, "don't you think I would if I could? I have not been so happy that I would throw away such happiness as you could give me. Some day you may know what it costs me to tell you that it is quite impossible."

"You give me no hope?" he asked, in a dull voice, and she saw that he had grown white to his very lips.

"None," she returned; then added, bitterly, "Oh, hope and I have had nothing to say to one another this long, long while."

Bootles dropped her hand listlessly. "Then it is no use my boring you," he said, turning away.

THEN WITH ONE IMPLORING BACKWARD LOOK SHE WENT AWAY AND LEFT HIM ALONE.

A fierce denial rose to the girl's lips, but she choked it down and suffered his words in silence. Then meekly, and with one imploring backward look at his tall figure as he stood, his head well up in spite of his defeat, looking into the fire, she went away and left him alone.

Chapter VII.

So it was all over. This was the end of all his hopes and dreams and wishes! This was the end! None of his bright hopes would ever be—none of his golden dreams would come to pass. His wishes had no weight with the woman he loved. He had looked forward—like a fool, he thought, bitterly—and had pictured her in a dozen different ways: at the head of his table, in the hunting-field, in the middle age, and in the decline of life, as Mignon's mother, as his wife. But it was all over now. When Madame's visit was over, she would go from under his roof, never to come back to it any more, forever.

He was still standing there when the door opened with some difficulty, and Miss Mignon appeared on the threshold.

"Bootles?" she said, inquiringly.

Bootles turned round to her. "Well?" he answered.

Miss Mignon heard the misery in his voice and ran to him. "Bootles got a headache?" she asked.

HE DROPPED INTO A CHAIR AND TOOK HER IN HIS ARMS.

He dropped into a chair and took her in his arms. "Such a headache, Mignon."

Miss Mignon knew what Bootles's headaches were, and drew his head down upon her small shoulder with an air of protecting and comforting dignity, equally pretty and absurd in one so young.

"Mignon loves Bootles," she whispered.

"Will Mignon always love Bootles?" he asked.

"Always," was the confident reply. "Mignon will always love Bootles."

And so in and because of his trouble the little child crept closer and closer into his heart, and drove out the greatest bitterness of his disappointment, and the clasp of her soft arms about his neck seemed to take away the sharpest sting of defeat. The touch of her baby lips upon his aching forehead—and it did ache—brought him a larger measure of comfort than any living thing had power to do at that moment.

If only he had known that Mignon was her child!

But Bootles was not the man to sulk with fate; if Miss Grace would not have him, no more was to be said, and no one but Mrs. Smith saw anything unusual between them. But trust Mrs.

Smith. She walked into Miss Grace's room and taxed her with it—taxed her in so friendly a way that the girl began to cry miserably. Mrs. Smith fumed.

"It is absurd," she cried, "to refuse such a man —such a position—such—such— Oh! it's absurd. I have no patience with you. You will never have such a chance again—never."

"Oh, never," she sobbed.

"Why, then, throw it away? Let me go and tell—"

"No; tell him nothing. I have already told him it is impossible. Oh, Mrs. Smith!" she cried, passionately, "do you think any woman in her senses would refuse him if she could help it? Not I, I assure you."

"It is inexplicable," said Mrs. Smith, but she protested no further.

So the next day they left Ferrers Court, Bootles driving them to the station. But it was all very different now—very different, too, from the last time he had driven them anywhere. There was no laughter, no joking, no promise to come again. He was not outwardly angry, not harsh nor hard in any way, but he was very polite; and politeness from him was heart-breaking.

It was soon over when they reached the station—a few minutes of that kind of conversation which people make when they are waiting for a carriage or a train, as they said the passengers of the London made while walking up and down quietly waiting for the end. There was a hand-shaking all round, the lifting of Bootles's and Lacy's hats, a fuss over Miss Mignon, and that was all. Miss Grace, on looking out of the carriage window with tear-dimmed eyes, saw that they were together, the child's hand in his. Miss Mignon's last words were yet ringing in her ears: "Bootles has gotted such a headache."

"Then Mignon must be very kind to him," Miss Grace whispered.

Ay, Miss Mignon had need to be kind, for Bootles had "gotted" such a heartache too!

Chapter VIII.

A crowd of roughs, a lesser crowd of third-rate spectators, and a lesser gathering of fashionable ones were assembled on the Blankhampton race-course, for it was the day of the Scarlet Lancer Steeple-chases.

On the Grand Stand were to be seen most of the rank and fashion of the neighborhood, and a goodly show of that class of people who are always to be found about towns which are also military stations—the class of people who have daughters to marry, and not much money to marry them with.

There were all the Scarlet Lancer ladies in full force, from the colonel's wife in blue velvet and sables, to the quartermaster's lady in a hard felt hat, with long diamond and pearl ear-rings. There were officers in cords and boots, their silken finery hidden by Newmarket coats. And there was the bride, Mrs. Allardyce, in pink and gray, the major's racing colors—oh lor! as the fellows said when they saw her. And there was Miss Mignon, a little three-year-old belle, got up in Bootles's colors —scarlet, purple, and gold—adapted in her small case to a warm frock of purple velvet, braided with scarlet and gold, and on her golden curls a jockey-cap to match it. Utterly absurd, most people said, but Bootles didn't seem to see it. Nor, for the matter of that, did Miss Mignon herself. Held by Bootles, or, when Bootles was riding, by Lacy, she sat on the broad ledge of the balcony and surveyed the world, like a queen in miniature.

It was a fine place for seeing; yes, and a fine place for hearing too, as Lacy testified afterwards in his own peculiar style of delivery.

"Er—I and Miss Mignon were waiting for Bootles to come down the lawn, when—er—a laday next to us—er—a little unpwrepossessing person—I found out afterwards that her name is Berwry—with a nose like a teapot-spout, and a mouth of the bull-dog ordah—little daughter, by-the-bye, pretty much of the same type, but just a shade less hideous—suddenly electwrified us by pulling out a huge pair of gold eye-glasses, and holding the wrace-card at arm's-length.

"'Ow!' said she, in a mincing voice, when Miles came down the lane looking like a sack of flour in a purple satin jacket—'Ow, Cap-tain Ferwrahs! Ow, Dorothy, my deah, Cap-tain Ferwrahs! Vewry handsome—and how beau-tifully he wrides! Ow, I'm shaw he'll win, and what a lovely horse! Cap-tain Ferwrahs! He's vewry handsome.'

"Well—er—I gave Miss Mignon a gwreat squeeze to hold her tongue—and she did. This Mrs.—er—Berwry went on expatiating on Miles's great beauty of person, and on the absolute certainty of his winning. 'And his pet name is Bootles,' she informed us. His pet name! Well, pwresently Bootles came sailing down the lawn in all his glowry, and Miss Mignon quite forgot the old girl, and shouted out to him. 'Bootles,' she called—'Bootles.'

"Bootles glanced up, and waved his hand, and—er—the old party called Berwry turned wround and eyed her sharply, saw the scarlet, purple, and gold of her dwress, looked at her card, and said, witheringly, 'Ow, I don't know him,' as if there were a dozen Captain Ferwers knocking about, and this was one of the eleven she didn't know.

"Well, when the wrace was over—er—who should come up but Miles.

"'Ah, Miles,' said I, 'I—er—heard a laday ex-patiating just now on your extrwreme beauty and gwrace and elegance of person—was shaw you'd win. What a pity you didn't!'

"'Bless my soul!' said Miles; 'was she pretty?'

"'Oh, don't be flattered; she took you for Bootles,' said I, ignoring the question.

"'Bootles's money again!' cwried Miles, with a gwreat wroar of laughter.

"Well, in two twos up comes Bootles. 'See me win, Mignon?' said he.

"So I—er—told him the stowry too, and Bootles laughed that absurd 'Ha! ha!' of his. 'Come along and have some lunch, Mignon, my sweetheart,' said he, 'and let's be out of this.'"

But it was after this incident that the most important event of that bright May day occurred—one of those fearful struggles to win, when half a dozen horses show well for the post, and all the field finds tongue and shouts its hardest.

"Ferrers wins! Blue and fawn—yellow and black! Miles wins—Miles wins! No, no; Ferrers in front—fawn and blue! Hartog—Hartog—Hartog wins! Miles in front! Ah, he's down! Ferrers—Miles—blue and fawn—Gilchrist gains—Miles—Gilchrist—Ferrers wins—Ferrers wins! All up with the others! Ferrers WINS!"

And then the company, good, bad, and indifferent, had time to remember that a man was down —no, not one man, but two. To find out that Hartog was bruised and stunned, but able with help to get to the dressing-room and recover himself, to learn that the swarming crowd around the other was watching a more exciting race than that which they had just witnessed with shouts and applause, that they were watching with awe and in silence a race between life and death—for Gilchrist, the "odd" man of the regiment, the man who had been nobody's friend, nobody's chum, was lying in the midst of them with his back broken, waiting for a hurdle.

They were all as sorry as men could be who had never been moved by feelings of friendship. The proceedings were stopped at once, and they went gravely back to barracks, those who had ridden, to get into morning-clothes, and all of them to hang about waiting for news.

But there was no hope, absolutely no hope whatever. With all his faults, failings, and peculiarities, Gavor Gilchrist was passing away from their midst by exchange, as Hartog had once wished—the exchange, not of one regiment for another, but of this world for the next.

THE SWARMING CROWD ROUND THE OTHER WAS WATCHING A MORE EXCITING RACE THAN THAT WHICH THEY HAD JUST WITNESSED.

It was about six o'clock that the senior of the two surgeons in attendance on Gilchrist entered the anteroom, and, looking around, beckoned for Bootles.

"What news?" asked several voices.

"He won't last the night. Bootles, he wants you."

"I'll come," said Bootles, rising.

"Sure to want Bootles," observed Preston.

"Oh yes; I should myself," returned another.

"Won't last the night," remarked a third. "Well, I never did like Gilchrist—never; but, all the same, I'm deuced sorry for him now, poor chap. For oh, by Jove! it's a fearful thing when you come to that."

And then they fell into silence again, waiting for Bootles to come back. Half an hour passed—three-quarters; then Bootles did not come. An hour; then Bootles appeared—came with a white face and a scared look in his blue eyes, followed by the doctor who had fetched him. Every man in the room was roused from a lounging attitude to one of expectation and surprise.

"Bootles," said Lacy, moving towards him.

But Bootles did not even look at him. He turned to the doctor and uttered words the like of which none of his hearers had ever heard from him before.

"I kept my temper, doctor—you think I did? I know the man's dying. Yes, I know, and I shouldn't like to think I lost my temper with a poor chap who was dying, but—but— No; I won't say a word. I'll go away and keep to myself until I've got over it a little. If I stop here I shall say something I shall be sorry for all the rest of my life."

"What is it, Bootles?" broke in Lacy, in his soft voice.

But Bootles did not reply for a moment. He stood still, trying hard to control himself; but Lacy, who had laid his hand upon his sleeve, felt that he was shaking from head to foot, and his very lips were trembling.

"Tell us," said Lacy, persuasively. "What is it?"

"He is Mignon's father!" Bootles answered. And then he broke from Lacy's grasp and fled.

"Impossible!" Lacy cried.

"Not at all; it is true," the doctor answered. "He is making his will now, leaving Bootles sole guardian and trustee to the child."

"The brute," burst out Preston, indignantly, remembering Gilchrist's words—not so long ago.

A RACE BETWEEN LIFE AND DEATH.

"Hush, hush! The man is dying, and death alters everything," the doctor cried.

"And Bootles kept his temper? Said nothing?"

"Not one word—of reproach."

"Has he seen her?"

"No. He would not, though Bootles asked him."

"His own child—and she Miss Mignon!"

"All the better. She cannot endure him."

"By Jove! But what a blow for Bootles!"

"How will he take it? Will it make any difference?"

"As wregards Miss Mignon? What wrot you talk. As if Bootles—" But there Lacy broke off in disgust, and the babel of surmises, questions, and answers went on.

And that night Gavor Gilchrist died.

Chapter IX.

Oh, but it was a blow for Bootles! To find he had been duped, tricked, made a fool of all this time; to remember the anxiety, the trouble, the expense to which he had been put; nay, to recall the chaff he had endured, and then to discover that Miss Mignon was Gilchrist's child—the child of the man he went perhaps nearer to hating than any one he had ever known in all his life! Everything came back to him then — the dead man's jibes and sneers and taunts, his unwearied efforts to tax him with an offence which he knew he had not committed. And though he had failed in that, oh, what a fool Gilchrist had made of him! That was the sting Bootles felt most of anything.

For hours after he left the anteroom Bootles kept out of every one's way—indeed until Lacy came to tell him that Gilchrist was dead. Then, it being close upon the hour of eleven, he went and knocked at the door of Mignon's nursery. The nurse opened it a few inches, and seeing who it was, set it open wide.

"Is Miss Mignon asleep?" he asked.

"Yes, sir; hours ago," the woman answered.

He passed into the inner room, where the child was lying. A candle burned on a table beside the cot, casting its light on the fair baby face, now flushed in sleep, and on the tangled golden curls. Both her arms lay outside the eider coverlet, one hand grasping the whip with which he had ridden and won that day, the other holding the card of the races. Bootles bent and scanned her face closely, but not one trace could he discern of likeness to the father—not one—and he drew a deep breath of relief that it was so.

Well he remembered Lacy's puzzled scrutiny of the year-old baby. "There's a likeness, but I don't know where to plant it." If there had been a likeness to Gilchrist then, it had now passed away; and as Bootles satisfied himself that it was so, his love for her, which during the last few hours had hung trembling in the balance, though he would hardly have acknowledged it, even to himself, re-asserted itself, and rose up in his heart stronger than ever. Just then she moved uneasily in her sleep.

"Lal, where is Bootles?" she asked. Then, after a pause, "Gotted another headache?" And an instant later, "Miss Grace said Mignon was to be very kind to Bootles."

Bootles bent down and kissed her, and she awoke.

"Bootles," she said, in sleepy surprise; then, imperatively, "Take me up."

So Bootles carried her to the fire in the adjoining room, where the nurse was sewing a fresh frill of lace on the pretty velvet frock, with its braidings of scarlet and gold, which she had worn that day.

"Lal said Mignon wasn't to go to Bootles," she said, reproachfully.

"Bootles has been bothered, Mignon," he answered.

"Poor Bootles!" stroking his cheek with her soft hand. "Bootles was vexed; Lal said so. But not with Mignon. Mignon told Lal so," confidently.

"Never with Mignon," answered Bootles, resting his cheek against the tossed golden curls, and feeling as if he had done this faithful baby heart a moral injustice by his hours of anger and doubt.

There was a moment of silence, broken by the nurse. "Have you heard, sir, how Mr. Gilchrist is?" she asked.

Bootles roused himself. "He is dead, nurse. Died half an hour ago."

"Then, if you please, sir," she asked, hesitatingly, "might I ask if it is true about Miss Mignon?"

"Yes, it is true," his face darkening.

"Because, sir, Miss Mignon should have mourning," she began, when Bootles cut her short.

"I shall not allow her to wear mourning for Mr. Gilchrist," he said, curtly; so the nurse dared say no more.

Three days later the funeral took place; and if the facts of the dead man's having acknowledged Miss Mignon as his child, and having admitted to Bootles that he had transferred her that night from his own quarters to Bootles's rooms, created a sensation, it was as nothing to the intense surprise caused by the will, which was read, by the dead man's desire, before all the officers of the regiment.

In it he left his entire property to his daughter, Mary Gilchrist, now in the care of Captain Ferrers, and commonly known as Mignon, on condition that Captain Ferrers consented to be her sole guardian and trustee until she had attained the age of twenty-one, or until her marriage, provided it should be with her guardian's sanction, and on the express understanding that Captain Ferrers should not give up the care of the child to her mother, even temporarily. To his wife, Helen Gilchrist, a copy of this testament was to be sent forthwith. Should any of the conditions be violated, the whole property of which he died possessed should go to his cousin, Lucian Gavor Gilchrist; but if the conditions be faithfully observed Captain Ferrers should have the power of applying any, or all, of the income arising from the estate for the use and maintenance of the said Mary Gilchrist.

"Cwrazy!" murmured Lacy to Bootles, who listened in contemptuous silence, and wondered in no small dismay what kind of a life he should have if Mignon's mother chose to make herself objectionable.

But the will was not crazy at all; far from it. It was only a very cleverly thought-out plan for keeping mother and child apart. Bootles would take care not to endanger Mignon's inheritance, and Gilchrist had taken advantage of it to carry out his animosity towards his wife to the bitter end.

But of course there was one contingency he had never thought of or provided for—marriage.

It was less than a week after Gilchrist's death that Bootles received a note by hand, signed Helen Gilchrist.

"Already!" he groaned, impatiently.

"May I trouble you to send the child to see me for half an hour during this afternoon?" she said, and that was all.

But Bootles did not see sending the child to be quietly stolen away. He forgot quite that since Gilchrist had not left his widow a farthing she would probably be now no better able to provide for the child than she had been when compelled to cast her baby upon the father's mercy. Therefore, immediately after lunch, he drove down to the hotel from which the note had been written. Yes; Mrs. Gilchrist was within—this way. And then—then—Bootles, with the child fast holding his hand, was shown into a room, and there they found—Miss Grace!

The truth flashed into his mind instantly. She rose hurriedly, and he saw that she was clad in black, but was not in widow's dress. She fell upon her knees and almost smothered Mignon with kisses.

"Mignon! Mignon!" she cried.

"Mignon has been very kind to Bootles," Mignon explained, not knowing whether to laugh or cry.

"My Mignon! my baby!" the mother sobbed.

Bootles watched them—the two things he loved best on earth.

"Have you nothing to say to me?" he asked at last.

"What shall I say?" She had risen from her knees, and now moved shyly away.

"You might say," said Bootles, severely, "that you are very sorry that you, a married woman, deceived me and stole my heart away. You might say that, for one thing."

"But I am not sorry," cried Mignon's mother, audaciously.

"Then you might take a leaf out of Mignon's book, and say, as she says when I have a headache, 'Mignon loves Bootles.'"

"I wreally do think," remarked Lacy to the fellows, when the astounding news had been told and freely discussed, "that now we must let that poor, malicious, cwrooked-minded chap wrest in his gwrave in peace. Seems to me," he continued, with his most reflective air, "that—er—Solomon was wright, and said a vewry wise thing, when he said, 'Love laughs at locksmiths.'"

BOOTLES WATCHED THEM — THE TWO THINGS HE LOVED BEST ON EARTH.

"Solomon!" cried a voice, amid a shout of laughter.

"Oh, wasn't it Solomon?" questioned Lacy, mildly. "It's of no consequence; some one said it. But only think of that poor devil spending his last moments wraising a barwrier to keep mother and child apart, and old Bootles fulfils all the conditions to the letter, and bwreaks them all in the spirit by—marwriage!"

BOOTS AND SADDLES;

Or, Life in Dakota with General Custer. By Mrs. Elizabeth B. Custer. With Portrait of General Custer. pp. 312. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A book of adventure is interesting reading, especially when it is all true, as is the case with "Boots and Saddles." * * * She does not obtrude the fact that sunshine and solace went with her to tent and fort, but it inheres in her narrative none the less, and as a consequence "these simple annals of our daily life," as she calls them, are never dull nor uninteresting.—Evangelist, N. Y.

Mrs. Custer's book is in reality a bright and sunny sketch of the life of her late husband, who fell at the battle of "Little Big Horn." * * * After the war, when General Custer was sent to the Indian frontier, his wife was of the party, and she is able to give the minute story of her husband's varied career, since she was almost always near the scene of his adventures.—Brooklyn Union.

We have no hesitation in saying that no better or more satisfactory life of General Custer could have been written. Indeed, we may as well speak the thought that is in us, and say plainly that we know of no biographical work anywhere which we count better than this. * * * Surely the record of such experiences as these will be read with that keen interest which attaches only to strenuous human doings; as surely we are right in saying that such a story of truth and heroism as that here told will take a deeper hold upon the popular mind and heart than any work of fiction can. For the rest, the narrative is as vivacious and as lightly and trippingly given as that of any novel. It is enriched in every chapter with illustrative anecdotes and incidents, and here and there a little life story of pathetic interest is told as an episode.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

It is a plain, straightforward story of the author's life on the plains of Dakota. Every member of a Western garrison will want to read this book; every person in the East who is interested in Western life will want to read it, too; and every girl or boy who has a healthy appetite for adventure will be sure to get it. It is bound to have an army of readers that few authors can expect.—Philadelphia Press.

These annals of daily life in the army are simple, yet interesting, and underneath all is discerned the love of a true woman ready for any sacrifice. She touches on themes little canvassed by the civilian, and makes a volume equally redolent of a loving devotion to an honored husband, and attractive as a picture of necessary duty by the soldier.—Commonwealth, Boston.

FLY-RODS AND FLY-TACKLE.

Suggestions as to their Manufacture and Use. By HENRY P. WELLS. Illustrated. pp. 364. Post 8vo, Illuminated Cloth, $2 50.

Mr. Wells has devoted more time and attention to the materials used in fly-fishing than any person we know of, and his experience is well set forth in this most valuable book. * * * The author is an amateur rod-maker who has experimented with every wood known to rod manufacturers, as well as with some that are not known to them, and therefore he is an undoubted authority on the subject. This chapter and the one following, which gives directions in rod-making, forms the most perfect treatise on rods extant. * * * The book is one of great value, and will take its place as a standard authority on all points of which it treats, and we cannot commend it too highly.—Forest and Stream, N. Y.

Since Izaak Walton lingered over themes piscatorial, we have learned to expect, in all essays on the gentle art of angling, a certain daintiness and elegance of literary form as well as technical utility. Publisher and author have co-operated to meet these traditional requirements in "Fly-Rods and Fly-Tackle." * * * Mr. Wells's competence to expound the somewhat intricate principles and delicate processes of fly-fishing will be plain to any reader who himself has some practical acquaintance with the art discussed. The value of the author's instructions and suggestions is signally enhanced by their minuteness and lucidity.—N. Y. Sun.

A complete manual for the ambitious lover of fishing for trout. * * * All lovers of fly-fishing should have Mr. Wells's book in their outfit for the sport that is near at hand.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Mr. Wells reveals to us the mysteries of lines, leaders, and reels, rods, rod material, and rod-making. He lets us into the secret of making repairs, and gives all due directions for casting the fly. * * * Moreover, Mr. Wells writes in an attractive style. There is a certain charm in the heartiness and grace wherewith he expresses his appreciation of those beauties of nature which the angler has so unlimited an opportunity of enjoying. Thus what may be called not only a technical, but also a scientific, knowledge of his subject is combined with a keen delight in hill, stream, and forest for the sake of the varied loveliness they display.—N. Y. Telegram.

A book of practical hints about the manufacture and use of anglers' gear. Fish-hooks, lines, leaders, rods and rod-making, repairs, flies and fly-fishing, are among the important subjects discussed with great fulness. The essay on "Casting the Fly" and "Miscellaneous Suggestions" are rich in points for beginners. It is to the latter, and not to the experts, that Mr. Wells modestly dedicates his work. His object is to supply precisely the kind of information of which he stood so much in need during his own novitiate.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

HOME STUDIES IN NATURE.

By Mary Treat, Author of "Chapters on Ants," &c. Illustrated. pp. 244. 12mo, Ornamental Cloth, $1 50.

Mrs. Treat roams through the fields in search of rare knowledge about birds, wasps, spiders, and those wonderful plants that entrap insects and thrive on their juices. Her originality in these researches is undoubted, and she adds a great deal to our stock of facts for use in the interpretation of nature. She has a pleasant style, and a winning knack of making disagreeable things seem otherwise. The pictures are many and good.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

A worthy tribute from a lover of nature to the animated world about her. It treats of birds, insects, plants that consume animals, and flowering plants. It has nearly seventy handsome illustrations, and the story is told in fascinating and clearly-expressed language. It is an admirable work with which to educate a family.—Boston Commonwealth.

To those who have given attention to the beauties of nature as developed in the winged world and the insect and floral branches, this little volume will be peculiarly grateful.—Albany Press.

Books on this subject are generally regarded by every one not professional scientists as dreadful bores. An exception must be made, however, in favor of Mrs. Mary Treat's "Home Studies in Nature." The only echoes of science between the two covers are the Latin names of birds, insects, and plants; all else are most curious and readable accounts of the doings of some creatures so tiny that they frequently are near us, and watching us, when we imagine ourselves alone. * * * This would be a capital book to give a bright-eyed boy or girl who complains that about home "there is nothing to look at." Adults, however will also enjoy the volume, and may make their eyesight keener by reading it.—N. Y. Herald.

The public should feel glad that occasionally a man or a woman finds highest pleasure in studying the ways and habits of nature, and publishing the result of such study to the world. This is what Mrs. Treat has done. * * * Her book is divided into four parts—observations on birds, habits of insects, plants that consume animals, and flowering plants. It is, moreover, helped by nearly seventy illustrations, which in a work of this character are of material assistance; for the great majority of readers are unfamiliar with the appearance of the birds, flowers, and insects, the habits of which are described. The author shows herself to be a keen, conscientious, and affectionate observer.—N. Y. Telegram.

Mrs. Treat can always command a delightful audience; for next to the pleasure of searching fields, woods, and streams for the beautiful or curious, it is charming to hear from so close an observer so much that is interesting and new, especially when all is told with vivacity and genuine enthusiasm. * * * The volume is finely illustrated, and its contents cannot fail to entertain the reader, young or old, who has learned, or is learning, about the busy world out-of-doors.—Worcester Daily Spy.

CHARLES NORDHOFF'S WORKS.

POLITICS FOR YOUNG AMERICANS. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. 16mo, Half Leather, 75 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

It is a book that should be in the hand of every American boy and girl, This book of Mr. Nordhoff's might be learned by heart. Each word has its value; each enumerated section has its pith. It is a complete system of political science, economical and other, as applied to our American system.—N. Y. Herald.

CALIFORNIA: A Book for Travellers and Settlers. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. A New Edition. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Mr. Nordhoff's plan is to see what is curious, important, and true, and then to tell it in the simplest manner. Herodotus is evidently his prototype. Strong sense, a Doric truthfulness, and a very earnest contempt for anything like pretension or sensationalism, and an enthusiasm none the less agreeable because straitened in its expression, are his qualities.—N. Y. Evening Post.

THE COMMUNISTIC SOCIETIES OF THE UNITED STATES; from Personal Visit and Observation: including Detailed Accounts of the Economists, Zoarites, Shakers; the Amana, Oneida, Bethel, Aurora, Icarian, and other Existing Societies; their Religious Creeds, Social Practices, Numbers, Industries, and Present Condition. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

Mr. Nordhoff has derived his materials from personal observation, having visited the principal Communistic societies in the United States, and taken diligent note of the peculiar features of their religious creed and practices, their social and domestic customs, and their industrial and financial arrangements. * * * With his exceptionally keen powers of perception, and his habits of practised observation, he could not engage in such an inquiry without amassing a fund of curious information. In stating the results of his investigations, he writes with exemplary candor and impartiality, though not without the exercise of just and sound discrimination.—N. Y. Tribune.

CAPE COD AND ALL ALONG SHORE: STORIES. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; 4to, Paper, 15 cents.

Light, clever, well-written sketches.—N. Y. Times.
A lively and agreeable volume, full of humor and incident.—Boston Transcript.

GOD AND THE FUTURE LIFE. The Reasonableness of Christianity. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Mr. Nordhoff's object is not so much to present a religious system as to give practical and sufficient reasons for every-day beliefs. He writes strongly, clearly, and in the vein that the people understand.—Boston Herald.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By WILLIAM GRAHAM SUMNER, Professor of Political and Social Science in Yale College. 16mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

There is no page of the book that is not weighty with meaning. The argument that runs through it is like a chain, strongly welded, link on to link. * * * Prof. Sumner gives clear, pointed, and powerful utterance to much social and political wisdom. The teaching of the book is just of that sort which is most needed by the young America of to-day.—Boston Commonwealth.

The conclusions he reaches are substantially unanswerable. * * * No more important doctrine than this can well be proclaimed, and our country owes a debt of gratitude to whoever will proclaim it in the sturdy style of this book. We need not despair of the Republic while our young men are fed upon such meat as this. Whether they adopt his conclusions or not, they cannot fail to be stimulated by his reasoning.—The Nation, N. Y.

Prof. Sumner has selected a subject of great interest and importance, and has treated it with ingenuity, penetration, and originality, and in a plain, homely, pungent, and effective style.—Brooklyn Union.

His little book is full of excellent maxims of conduct formed on the manly principle of doing hard work and letting everybody have a fair chance. * * * These eleven short chapters are undoubtedly the ablest of recent contributions to matters on which much unprofitable ink is spent.—N. Y. Times.

This volume contains a most instructive discussion of certain economic questions which are of living interest touching upon the duties of the State to classes or individuals embraced in it.—Boston Globe.

The style is bright and racy, and the argument is allowed to lose none of its force by the use of technical terms. The book is suggestive, and will be found helpful to those who desire to reach correct conclusions on subjects of practical importance.—Christian at Work, N. Y.

Prof. Sumner has enforced in very few and very simple words some of the most important and most neglected principles of political and social economy; has exposed, with temperate but none the less telling sarcasm, the most absurd but not least popular crotchets of modern philanthropic enthusiasm.—Saturday Review, London.

STORMONTH'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

A Dictionary of the English Language, Pronouncing, Etymological, and Explanatory, Embracing Scientific and Other Terms, Numerous Familiar Terms, and a Copious Selection of Old English Words. By the Rev. JAMES STORMONTH. The Pronunciation Carefully Revised by the Rev. P. H. PHELP, M.A. pp. 1248. 4to, Cloth, $6 00; Half Roan, $7 00; Sheep, $7 50.

Also in HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, in Twenty-three Parts. 4to, Paper, 25 cents each Part. Muslin covers for binding supplied by the publishers on receipt of 50 cents.

As regards thoroughness of etymological research and breadth of modern inclusion, Stormonth's new dictionary surpasses all its predecessors. * * * In fact, Stormonth's Dictionary possesses merits so many and conspicuous that it can hardly fail to establish itself as a standard and a favorite.—N. Y. Tribune.

This may serve in great measure the purposes of an English cyclopædia. It gives lucid and succinct definitions of the technical terms in science and art, in law and medicine. We have the explanation of words and phrases that puzzle most people, showing wonderfully comprehensive and out-of-the-way research. We need only add that the Dictionary appears in all its departments to have been brought down to meet the latest demands of the day, and that it is admirably printed.—Times, London.

A most valuable addition to the library of the scholar and of the general reader. It can have for the present no possible rival.—Boston Post.

It has the bones and sinews of the grand dictionary of the future. * * * An invaluable library book.—Ecclesiastical Gazette, London.

A work which is certainly without a rival, all things considered, among the dictionaries of our language. The peculiarity of the work is that it is equally well adapted to the uses of the man of business, who demands compactness and ease of reference, and to those of the most exigent scholar.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

As compared with our standard dictionaries, it is better in type, richer in its vocabulary, and happier in arrangement. Its system of grouping is admirable. * * * He who possesses this dictionary will enjoy and use it, and its bulk is not so great as to make use of it a terror.—Christian Advocate, N. Y.

A well-planned and carefully executed work, which has decided merits of its own, and for which there is a place not filled by any of its rivals.—N. Y. Sun.

A work of sterling value. It has received from all quarters the highest commendation.—Lutheran Observer, Philadelphia.

A trustworthy, truly scholarly dictionary of our English language.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

The issue of Stormonth's great English dictionary is meeting with a hearty welcome everywhere.—Boston Transcript.

A critical and accurate dictionary, the embodiment of good scholarship and the result of modern researches. Compression and clearness are its external evidences, and it offers a favorable comparison with the best dictionaries in use, while it holds an unrivalled place in bringing forth the result of modern philological criticism.—Boston Journal.

Full, complete, and accurate, including all the latest words, and giving all their derivatives and correlatives. The definitions are short, but plain, the method of making pronunciation very simple, and the arrangement such as to give the best results in the smallest space.—Philadelphia Inquirer.
